How many people in Africa live without any access to electricity? According to International Energy Agency, 84 million people in Nigeria alone had no access to electricity as of 2011. Nigeria is Africa's largest country by population. With a 2011 population of 162 million, that means that 52% of Nigerians lacked access to electrical power. Many other African nations have even lower access rates. Across the continent, an average of 11 million people per country had no access to electricity. By comparison, the whole of Latin America had only 24 million people living without access to electricity (or about 5% of the population in 2011). The Middle East had 19 million. While it might sound unnatural to live without all the electrical items that play a large part in our lives, living without electricity has been something humans have done since the dawn of man. With determination, a positive attitude, and a bit of ingenuity you too can live without electricity, be it for just a day or the rest of your life. Steps. Method 1 of 2: Going Off the Grid. Part One: Lighting and Heating. {"smallUrl":"https://www.wikihow.com/images/thumb/5/57/Live-Without-Electricity-Step-1-Version-2.jpg/v4-459px-Live-Without-Electricity-Step-1-Version-2.jpg"} Refrigerator that cools without electricity. There are many interesting home appliances that can be operated without electric power in the atelier where various trial products are made, as well as in the main house. One example is a non-electric refrigerator. Not many people want to take such a lot of time to make a cup of coffee in today's society, which requires speed everywhere and at all times. Fujimura did not actually expect much when he started to market the roaster. The non-electric way of life that Fujimura suggests is not just a lifestyle without electricity. It also incorporates his philosophy on leading a happy and affluent life using appropriate technology without depending on energy and money.
