Abstract: Welcome to International Relations Theory! In this course, we will examine the different ways in which international politics is understood, explained, interpreted and judged by different theoretical traditions and paradigms. We will be exploring different frameworks for thinking about why and how international politics works in the way that it does, but also for thinking about how international politics ought to be.

9.2 Theories of International Relations.

PLEASE NOTE: This book is currently in draft form; material is not final.

Learning Objectives.

In this section you learn about

- Realism: The approach to international relations theory that says that states must look out for their own interests first, and that military and economic power are the keys to security. It suggests that states should and do look out for their own interests first. Realism presumes that states are out for themselves first and foremost.

International Relations Theory is a great achievement and tremendous service to a discipline that still struggles to grasp the often tragic nature of world affairs.

â€™ Gerald Schneider - International Relations Chair, University of Konstanz, and President of the European Political Science Association (2013â€“2015).
