Supporters of Eurocommunism hoped to transform society towards socialism within the constitutional and legal means provided by the capitalist system, primarily by attaining parliamentary power. In the words of former Spanish Communist Party General Secretary Santiago Jos  Carrillo Solares, the aim was "democratizing the apparatus of the capitalist state," but "without needing to destroy it radically by force." The reason this idea could gain footing on the left had to do with the legacies of fascism and Stalinism in Russia, which gave the institution of parliament an increa Western European communists came to Eurocommunism via a variety of routes. For some, it was their direct experience of feminist and similar action while for others it was a reaction to the political events of the Soviet Union at the apogee of what Mikhail Gorbachev later called the Era of Stagnation. This process was accelerated after the events of 1968, particularly the crushing of the Prague Spring. The politics of d tente also played a part.  ^ Eurocommunism is Anti-Communism. Further reading.
